1. In early December 1950 the Yugoslav Government established a Committee of Bulgarian Exiles, the ostensible purpose of which is to protect the interests of Bulgarian refugees in Yugoslavia and to obtain their assistance in the "building of socialism" in that country. The man chosen by the Yugoslavs to organize the Committee was one Simic, a Yugoslav and member of the CPY Regional Committee of Belgrade.
2. With the assistance of the UDB, Simic contacted thirty-two of the most prominent Bulgarian refugees in Belgrade and in the immediate vicinity and appointed them members of an organizing committee. Only twenty-seven members attended the first meeting. Throughout the meeting dissatisfaction at Yugoslav interference was so marked that only threats from Simic succeeded in keeping the delegates from walking out. Questions over which most disagreement prevailed follow:
 - a. The majority demanded that the organization be placed under the protection of some international body such as the UNO. Simic replied that this was impossible since it would infringe on Yugoslav sovereignty.
 - b. The Bulgarians demanded liaison with other Bulgarian exile groups in the West, but this also was refused.
 - c. The Bulgarians disagreed with Simic on the extent of their participation in the building of socialism in Yugoslavia.
3. When a vote was finally taken, seven were in favor of the organization, six against it, and the remainder abstained. The following were elected to office:

Maxim Petrov, to Novi Sad .

Ivan Piperov, to Kragujevac and Paracin.

5. After the meeting Alexander Dimitrov Tabakov was arrested for his refusal to cooperate, and an attempt was made to arrest Zalesko Rusov, who, however, succeeded in escaping from Belgrade. The other Committee members were informed that if they and other Bulgarians refused to cooperate with this plan, they would be considered enemies of the regime, would not be permitted to work, and students would be forced to give up their studies.
